A few years ago, Adobe acquired its rival company Pixelmator, and since then it introduced some great raw editing features, along with many other improvements, scaling them up from a simple pixel-level tool to a true photo editing powerhouse. I should also mention that this is one of the few photo editing tools that can actually stand up to Apple's latest photo editing software. While I rarely use Adobe's other photo editing products, Lightroom and Photoshop are probably two of the most important tools in the photography workflow, and I'm happy with where Adobe is taking the macOS version. I'm hoping the company will eventually bring the iPad Pro version to the Mac platform, leveraging some of the platform-specific features that elevate the iPad Pro's performance when used with third-party apps. Here, I'll highlight some of the features and improvements that I consider most important in the product.

The reality is that the iPad Pro has more than enough grunt for the serious work of an image editor for still and video images. The power of the hardware itself definitely makes a difference. It's a bit of a legwork to get the iPad Pro into the photo editing mindset, but you learn fast, and once you get the hang of it, you are capable of achieving a high level of photo editing mastery on the iPad Pro. You'll also likely enjoy the speed of the editing process, and that an iPad Pro can truly edit images as fast as you can tap the screen an entire time. I've been editing photos on the iPad Pro for about two months now, and I have truly noticed a difference in the editing experience, a difference that is very much in line with how we were editing photos with the Mac, but now working on the iPad Pro takes about half as long.
