In general you are saying that LR5 is much slower than previous versions of LR? I've never found LR5 (FC) to be noticeably slower than LR4.5 (FC) which I found to be actually a little faster than LR4.9 (FC). Yes, I think it is poor form to mix screenshots and streaming video. I know that one of the most popular features of Photoshop is the streaming video function... and I can use that myself, so I don't have a beef with the streaming video function. The battery percentage is mostly present to indicate the time left on the battery. A lower number means the battery is getting discharged faster, so it can't stay on for more than a certain amount of time. The battery life is not guaranteed. I have gotten images with percentages before, but never noticed a difference in how long they actually captured. I prefer to remember what time the battery level was when I took the image. Camera shake mounts work well when venturing through up to a 70 mm lens on a 2.7kg body. With the Nikon 80-200 f/2.8, I need to be mindful of following another point, where the lens is wider to farther back. Windows 10 does seem to deal with GPU memory properly, which isn't really something I thought I'd need to put effort into before. Memory management in Windows older than 8 was no-effort brain dead compared to W10, and I'm happy. New in Elements 16 are the following enhancements and improvements to photography:
